

Sample Web Site Disclaimers

There are a wide variety of disclaimer language examples in use on law firm websites and taking a little time to see what others are doing can be worthwhile. Regardless, make sure that you draft a disclaimer that will address the specifics of your practice and the unique issues that will arise based upon the design of your website.

The two most important types of disclaimers for your website are the general contact disclaimer and the general information disclaimer.

Contact disclaimers are typically used wherever an email address, email hyperlink, or submission form has been provided for a potential new client to contact the firm or an individual firm attorney. The following are just a few examples that may help you identify the issues that will need to be addressed. Note that four of the examples are what are referred to as “click through” disclaimers. This type of disclaimer is thought to provide a little extra protection from being tainted by requiring the prospective client to accept the terms of the disclaimer before being able to send an email to the firm.

In addition, every law firm website should contain a general information disclaimer regarding the accuracy of any content on the website and the fact that the content should never be relied upon as specific legal advice. This general disclaimer should also disclaim any responsibility for information on any third party website that you have provided a link to. Also add in a copyright statement if appropriate.

Finally, some legal websites are also including privacy policies regarding how any information submitted is or will be used.
